

Man stuck with $3,700 booze bill sues Rush Street club

SUN-TIMES MEDIA WIRE October 9, 2013 10:51AM

46

8

0

0

+1

1

54

16

Updated: October 9, 2013 10:52AM

A Chicago man is suing a Rush Street bar, claiming someone forged his signature on receipts for more than $3,700 worth of alcohol purchases while he was intoxicated.

Haitham Alramli filed the suit Tuesday in Cook County Circuit Court against Proof, a nightclub at 1045 N. Rush.

Alramli claims he woke up at his home after he had several drinks and “blacked out” at the bar on Jan. 6, according to the suit.

Several days later, he learned the bar had charged a total of $3,730 to his American Express credit card, which included $1,455 in gratuity, the suit said.

Alramli says the signatures on two receipts Proof submitted to his credit card company are not his, and that he believes an employee of the bar made and signed for the unauthorized purchases.

A phone number for the establishment was not working Tuesday evening, and an email seeking comment was not immediately returned.

Alramli has tried to contest the bill with both the bar and American Express, but both refused to reverse the charges, the suit says.

The suit two-count claims violations of the state’s Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act, and seeks an unspecified amount in damages.

46

8

0

0

+1

1

54

16

